"FIVE FLIGHTS UP."

Rickety stairs and rickety chairs,
And rickety tables, too;
(The kind gods answer my daily prayers
With beautiful dreams of you!)
A broken bust of the wise and just (Ah, life and fame are fleet!)

And that's where your face is sweet! If you were here-but the future knows Alone when your face I'll see— You'd lure the red of the latest rose To that ruined vase for me. If you were here! . . . How the wils wish thrills My heart as the words:I write! f you were here with your kind eyes, dear-If you only were here to-night!

The wind's abroad and the stars are dead-The world and the storm's at strife: But still the singer must write fer bread-For the bitterest bread of life. I had rather sleep as the dim skies weep-

The skies that have los their blue To drift to the garden of dreams and reap Beautiful dreams of you!

But here is a song for you-soft and swee To the music it makes for me?

A song, my dear, that has not a tear—
No sigh from the lips that pray

For only the touch that I loved so much

To lighten the lonely way.

In the beautiful days gone by.
Rickety stairs and rickety chairs,
And rickety tables, too;
But night and light and the whole world

With beautiful dreams of you! -F. L. Stanton, in Atlanta Constitution.

The judge couldn't help wondering if this were the son of Grant on the supreme bench, whom he had never met, although he knew his father intimately. The girl's gentle voice broke as she said this and Ned cried:

"O, Alice, I wish you wouldn't think of that. It just breaks me up to see you cry, you know."

Then followed a silence during which Alice must have been in some way comforted, for she said, in a steady voice: "No, my dear boy, I have been very

I sentenced Rand, and if you care to call on me I should be glad to see you. Perhaps we may think of some arguments to make Miss Rand look at the case differently. At any rate I agree with his honor, your father, and am also 'with you.' Yours,

"ROBERT STORROW." The next day the judge was obliged to go to a distant city to act as referee in a case.

The Rand case was almost purely a circumstantial one and hung on the handwriting in which the false entries had been made in the books. The handwriting experts all agreed that the entries had been made by Rand; indeed, the prisoner admitted as much.

He had pleaded "not guilty," and when he admitted the identity of the As ever a song may be— when he admitted the identity of the For it bears your name, and what is fam. handwriting there was little left to do for him. Hooper, the president of the bank, was in constant attendance at the trial, and expressed great sorrow for Rand. Shortly after the sentence Hooper left the bank and went to another city, where he engaged in a private banking and brokerage business. It was in this city that Judge Storrow was now sitting.

One night at his club the conversation drifted round to money and banking. The judge made the remark that he wished to procure a letter of credit for his niece, who was going abroad, and some one suggested Hooper's house as the best place to get it.

A MISSIONARY HEN.

Boston Globe.

Hooper is still serving his time .-

She Was Brought from Koo-Koo, China, and She Laid Eggs for the Heathen.

Some ten years ago Capt. J. Clifford Entwisle, now city clerk of Salem, then master of a New York vessel sailing to China and Japan, brought home from China a little hen. He named the bird Koo-Koo, for the town whence she came. He presented the hen to his wife, and the bird gradually became a pet of the house. She would lay her eggs in the house.

Capt. and Mrs. Entwisle were interested in church and missionary work. So Mrs. Entwisle conceived the June 2, idea of devoting the proceeds of the eggs and chickens of Koo-Koo to the missionary cause, and for the seven years little Koo-Koo lived all her earnings went to convert Chinese that way. The hen became as much of and cluck until someone went and found the egg; then she would fly up July 11, on the window sill and peck at the windren in the far-away land whence came the hen. There it took so well that it ! was translated into Chinese and read to the little Chinese children in their own language. It was the story of a little hen called Koo-Koo, which under-took to support one little Chinese girl Aug. 20, that she might be educated. It con-that she might be educated. It con-that she might be educated. It contained an account of a meeting of the children of Koo-Koo, quite a numerous tribe of various ages.

After hearing that story read, a Chinese boy painted a picture of the meeting of Koo-Koo and her descendants to represent a scene described by Mrs. Entwisle. It represents the old hen and three younger ones, with eight or ten very small chicks. The picture is made on a sheet of brown paper, and the hens are almost life-size for Chinese hens. It was sent to the missionary headquarters in Boston first, and yesterday was sent down to Mrs. Entwisle, by whom it is highly prized .-Boston Herald.

Walls have had ears since curiosity began; now it seems they have eyes. too, if we may generalize from the story of a contemporary. A well-known photographer of New York recently Jan. 5, had his country house overhauled. A new skylight was added, and alterations were made in the roof. The men Feb 12 took their time and did not overwork themselves, but this did not prevent March 16, the roofer from presenting a bill almost as "steep" as his calling. When the owner of the house expostulated, it was explained to him that the men had to be paid for their time, and they had spent several days on the job. "No wonder," said the photographer; and then he produced a number of snapshot photographs, representing the men on the roof of his house as taken from the attic window of an adjoining building. Some were sitting smoking, some were reading newspapers, and others were lying on their backs. "Why," said the astonished roofer, "these are my men!" "Exactly so," replied the photographer, "and they are April 6, Forest Samerson, earning my money."-Youth's Companion.
